Option A Freshwater – Drainage basins

Drainage basin hydrology and geomorphology

1. Drainage basin: the area that is drained by a river and its tributaries.
Endorheic: a closed drainage basin, i.e. one that does not reach the sea.
2. It allows the movement of energy and matter across its boundary; therefore, it is an open system.
3. A systems approach classifies parts of the hydrological cycle as stores, processes (inputs) and outputs, whereas a graphical representation uses images to show the components of the cycle, and the direction of processes.
4. Erosion in upland areas may produce waterfalls, gorges and potholes, whereas erosion in a lowland area is likely to produce meanders and oxbow lakes.
5. Upstream, the load is likely to be angular and larger, whereas downstream the load is likely to be rounder and smaller, due to attrition.
6. Interception: water that is retained by plant surfaces and later evaporated away or absorbed by the plant.
Evaporation: the process by which a liquid or a solid is changed into a gas. Evaporation increases under warm, dry conditions and decreases under cold, calm conditions.
Infiltration: the process by which water soaks into or is absorbed by the soil.
Groundwater: subsurface water contained in permeable rocks.
Base flow: the part of a river's discharge that is provided by groundwater seeping into the bed of a river.
7. Waterfalls frequently occur on horizontally bedded rocks. The soft rock is undercut by hydraulic action and abrasion. The weight of the water and the lack of support cause the waterfall to collapse and retreat. Over thousands of years the waterfall may retreat enough to form a gorge of recession.
8. See Figure A.17 on page 14.
9. When a stream flows into a standing body of water it may form a delta. For deltas to be formed a river needs to carry a large volume of sediment. Deposition is increased if the water is salty, as this causes salt particles to group together (a process termed flocculation) and become heavier, so they are deposited. Vegetation also increases the rate of deposition by slowing down the water, a process known as bioconstruction. There is a regular succession of deposits. The finest deposits are removed furthest, medium-grade deposits are deposited as steep-angled wedges, and the coarsest material is deposited at the top.

10. Aquifers are rocks that contain significant quantities of water. They are permeable rocks such as sandstone and limestone.

Flooding and flood mitigation

1. A storm hydrograph or flood hydrograph shows how a river channel responds to the key processes of the hydrological cycle. It is a graph on which river discharge during a storm or run-off event is plotted against time.
2. The river regime is the seasonal variation in the flow of a river – and mainly depends on the amount and nature of precipitation, seasonal variations in temperature and evapotranspiration, and changes in vegetation cover.
3. Floods with a very high magnitude have a low frequency, whereas floods with a high frequency have a low magnitude.
4. Land-use zoning permits compatible land-uses in areas of high flood risk. For example, this may be pastoral farming, recreational land-use or a nature reserve. In contrast, land-uses that are vulnerable to floods, such as industry, residential and services, are only permitted in areas where the flood risk is much lower.
5. Physical factors that increase flood risk include precipitation type and intensity, temperature and evapotranspiration, antecedent moisture, drainage basin size and shape, drainage density, porosity and permeability of rocks and soils, gradient, vegetation cover, and land-use.
6. Urbanization leads to an increase in the peak of flood and a shorter time-lag due to:
 - the creation of highly impermeable surfaces, such as roads, roofs, pavements
 - the presence of smooth surfaces served with a dense network of drains, gutters and underground sewers, which increase drainage density
 - the reduction of the carrying capacity of natural river channels caused by bridge supports or riverside facilities.
