

Creating LSD

Some notes on the environment needed for these reactions...

All of these chemicals, and their intermediates are typically sensitive to UV light, a dark room is necessary, depending on the intensity of light used and the storage solvent. LSD could degrade to turn LSD in less than an hour, this applies to all lysergamides due to the carbon bonds at the position connecting to the amide and the C-H in the middle of the ergoline. Due to the reactivity of some of these intermediates you will want an entirely inert environment. It's not normally a big deal, but we are dealing with very small amounts of the amides in this case so it can't hurt to use an inert environment. This can be achieved by running nitrogen gas through flasks with the appropriate attachments, or if you're feeling particularly hardcore, you could use a glove box like this:

The one pictured here is entirely waterproof and has pressure gauges and thermometers. You probably will not need a box with all that built in as you shouldn't be changing any pressures.

You will need a way to supply nitrogen and vacuum it back out as well as any contaminants and gasses released during the reaction. You will want to seal the box as best as possible and dessiccate it to a nearly 0% humidity. You will also need a way to supply the inside of the box with fresh, cold water for the condensor

Recrystallization can extract the lysergic acid from the solution. You will want to evaporate any current solution so that it forms the salts of lysergic acid and HCl, then perform the recrystallization in water. The NH4Cl is very soluble and should be easy to extract

Verify final product with the melting point. The MP of pure lysergic acid is 235-245°C. If your lysergamide had varying R and R1 groups then the MP may be different.

Note: you can also do a basic amide hydrolysis and get lysergic carboxylate and ammonia which is released as a gas. The carboxylate can then be protonated by sulfuric acid and recrystallized the same as above

This is a small sidenote on making ALD since someone had asked

The process is acetylation of lysergic acid.

The final product can be recrystallized in water to remove the acetic acid. After this you can continue on with the other steps.

note: HCl is not hydrochloric acid, it is hydrogen chloride. It is probably best to do the reaction in a dessicated environment or in a flask with a supply of an inert gas such as N2

These 2 steps will probably be the trickiest to do as alkyl chlorides are particularly reactive to water. They will hydrolyse back to the carboxylic acid even in cold water.

You can react LSD with tartaric acid or maleic acid to achieve a greater stability.

I recommended less than 0°C for this reaction due to the reactivity of alkyl chlorides. This reaction should be quite spontaneous even at low temperatures and the low temps help prevent unwanted alkyl chloride hydrolysis

The final product needs to be purified and have the isomers removed/converted

Although the procedures listed in this image will not produce the best yields, they are probably the easiest to do and generally the quickest route to getting LSD.
