Eat small meals frequently throughout the day to help regulate blood sugar and hunger. Most people could eat less and eating less is linked to longer lifespan in research.

The Ideal Cave Man diet is the modern attempt to reproduce our ancestral way of eating prior to farming and domestication of animals. Research has shown us that humans in that time period actually ate a far more diverse diet than we do today which did include some grains and legumes, but those grains were untouched by modern selective breeding and genetic modification and were eaten in extremely small amounts (amounts that one could gather in the wild, without a planted field of grain). This diet in modern society may help to decrease many of the most common nutritional diseases, such as diabetes and cardiovascular diseases when it is followed properly. It combines elements of local and seasonal eating with quality food sourcing, elimination of processed foods and chemicals and high levels of nutritionally dense foods—or nutritional eating.
