Comparative Embryology

An embryo is an organism in its earliest stages of development. In order to study evolution, scientists often compare the embryos of different organisms to determine how closely related they are. Closely related species will show more similarities in embryos than species that are not closely related. Below you will see a variety of vertebrate embryos in three different stages of development. Vertebrates are organisms that have a backbone or spinal column. The earliest stage is at the top, and the most developed embryos are pictured at the bottom.
