NUTRITION CASE STUDIES

Now that you've learned all the information you need to create individualized nutritional programs, in this week, Menno will go over some case studies. These case studies should help you understand how to distribute your macros based on the different nutrient timing factors. There are 2 points that I cannot emphasize enough.

1. The goal of this course is not to learn to blindly copy my methods. It is to understand the Bayesian Bodybuilding principles. Some of these case studies are from clients I had years ago and now I might estimate their body fat percentage, ideal fat intake, TEF or optimal energy balance factor differently. Applied personal training is where science meets art: you will have to make many judgment calls, as you will encounter situations not covered in scientific publications.
2. In line with the above, the idea of these case studies is to give you an illustration of how a reasonable program for the given individual looks like. You'll get the best educational results if you try to design a program yourself based on the course principles and then see if it's similar to the case study's program. If it's not, that's what the group discussion is for. I know many people would prefer to 'just get the answer', but it won't be in your educational benefit. It's the same as in math class: everything looks easy when you see the answer in front of you, but only by doing the calculations yourself do you achieve true insight into the process.
3. Let go of the constrained thinking of diets as being set up for calendar days. Instead, start thinking in terms of anabolic window periods over time for an individual. Outside of the anabolic window PSMIF periods are the most efficient use of someone's time, since they maximize fat loss and free up more calories to be allocated to the anabolic window periods where nutrient partitioning is better and they can contribute to muscle growth rather than fat gain.
