

CCNA 2 Chapter 7

Distance Vector Routing Protocols

As you know, routers can be configured to use one or more IP routing protocols. In this chapter, you learn the initial configuration of the router to enable the Routing Information Protocol (RIP) and the Interior Gateway Routing Protocol (IGRP). In addition, you learn how to monitor IP routing protocols.

After the router tests the hardware and loads the Cisco IOS system image, it finds and applies the configuration statements. These entries provide the router with details about router-specific attributes, protocol functions, and interface addresses. Remember that if the router cannot locate a valid startup-config file, it enters an initial router configuration mode called setup mode or system configuration dialog.

With the setup mode command facility, you can answer questions in the system configuration dialog. This facility prompts you for basic configuration information. The answers that you enter allow the router to build a sufficient but minimal router configuration that includes the following:

- An inventory of interfaces
- An opportunity to enter global parameters
- An opportunity to enter interface parameters
- A setup script review
- An opportunity to indicate whether or not you want the router to use this configuration

After you confirm setup mode entries, the router uses the entries as a running configuration. The router also stores the configuration in NVRAM as a new startup-config, and you can start using the router. For additional protocol and interface changes, you can use the enable mode and enter the command configure.

Concept Questions

Demonstrate your knowledge of these concepts by answering the following questions in the space that is provided.

1. Routers can be configured to use one or more IP routing protocols. Identify and briefly explain the different IP routing protocols.

At the Internet layer of the TCP/IP suite of protocols, a router can use an IP routing protocol to accomplish routing through the implementation of a specific routing algorithm. Examples of IP routing protocols include the following:

RIP—A distance-vector routing protocol

IGRP—Cisco's distance-vector routing protocol

OSPF—A link-state routing protocol
