The Storm's Arrival

Lena stood on the porch, watching the dark clouds roll in like a pack of stampeding horses. The wind howled through the trees, shaking the branches as if whispering a warning. The first drops of rain splattered against the ground, cool and sharp, like tiny needles pricking the earth.

She had always loved storms. She loved their wild energy, the way the air smelled fresh and electric. But this one felt different. The sky was an iron curtain, thick and unyielding, swallowing the last bits of golden sunlight. A crack of lightning split the sky, followed by a deep, rumbling growl of thunder.

Lena's little brother, Milo, ran onto the porch, his eyes wide. "It sounds like a giant is stomping through the sky!" he whispered.

She smiled at him. "Maybe it is," she said. "Or maybe the clouds are playing a drum solo just for us."

The rain began to fall in earnest, hammering the roof with steady, rhythmic beats. Lena took a deep breath, filling her lungs with the scent of rain and earth. The storm had arrived, fierce and beautiful, a wild dance of nature unfolding before her eyes.
