- 2. Multiple and Single-Process Models: This model has two types: multiple-process models and single-process models. Multiple-process models suggest that there are multiple stages or processes involved in decision-making, such as information processing, evaluation, and choice. Single-process models suggest that decision-making is a single, unified process.
- 3. Dual-Process Models: These models suggest that there are two distinct systems or processes involved in decision-making. System 1 is fast, automatic, and emotional, while System 2 is slow, deliberate, and rational. The interaction between these two systems determines the final decision.
- 4. Heuristic Models: These models suggest that people use simple rules or shortcuts (heuristics) to make decisions. These heuristics are based on past experiences and are often used to quickly assess the value of different options.
- 5. Prospect Theory: This theory suggests that people's decisions are influenced by their subjective perception of probabilities and outcomes. It shows that people are generally risk-averse when it comes to gains but risk-seeking when it comes to losses.
- 6. Behavioral Decision Theory: This theory integrates psychological and behavioral factors into the study of decision-making. It recognizes that people's decisions are often influenced by emotions, social norms, and other psychological factors.
- 7. Information Processing Models: These models focus on the cognitive processes involved in decision-making, such as the encoding, storage, and retrieval of information. They suggest that decisions are made based on the information that is available and how it is processed.
- 8. Social Decision-Making Models: These models focus on the social context of decision-making. They suggest that people's decisions are often influenced by the opinions and actions of others, as well as social norms and cultural values.
- 9. Neuroeconomic Models: These models integrate neuroscience and economics to study decision-making. They suggest that decisions are made based on the activation of specific brain regions and the release of neurotransmitters.
- 10. Evolutionary Decision-Making Models: These models suggest that decision-making is a result of evolutionary processes. They suggest that people's decisions are often influenced by the need to survive and reproduce, and that certain decision-making strategies have evolved over time.
