

Chapter 15

- Macroeconomics looks at the economy as a whole.
 - Economic growth- growth in total output and living standards
 - Business cycles,
 - Changes in the average level of all prices—which is called inflation when prices rise and deflation when prices fall—
 - Unemployment
 - Changes in the productivity of the labour force,
 - Total imports, total exports, and the balance between them.
- The total output of the economy is called its gross domestic product (GDP). GDP refers to the value of what is produced in a country.
- While gross national income or product (GNI/GNP) refers to the income accruing to residents of a country, including net income from overseas assets.
- GDP can be measured in three ways:
 - The sum of values added by all producers
 - The sum of income claims generated in producing goods and services
 - The spending on all final goods and services produced.
- The GDP gap- the difference between actual real GDP and its potential or trend value.
- GDP is relevant to the wellbeing of a countries individuals.

Why Do We Need Macroeconomics?

- Macroeconomics as a subject was invented to help produce policies that could stabilise economic fluctuations.
- We need a separate subject called macro because there are forces that affect the economy as a whole and would not just be understood if we looked at individual markets.
 - e.g the major recession of 2008-09
