

Chapter 11 Genetics

11.1 DNA is Reproduced by semiconservative Replication:

- Watson and crick recognized that because of the arrangement and nature of the nitrogenous base each strand of a DNA double helix could serve as a template for the synthesis of its complement
- Proposed that if the helix were unwound each nucleotide along the two parent strands would have an affinity for its complementary nucleotide
- Complementary is due to the potential hydrogen bonds that can be formed
- Semiconservative model:
  - The double stranded DNA contains one parental and one daughter strand following replication.
  - Each replicated DNA molecule would consist of one "old" and one "new" strand, semiconservative replication
- Conservative replication:
  - Complementary polynucleotide chains are synthesized as described earlier, following synthesis, however, the two newly created strands then come together and the parental strands reassociate. The original helix is thus conserved
  - Both parental strands stay together after DNA replication
- Dispersive model:
  - The parental strands are dispersed into two new double helices following replication. Hence each strand consists of both old and new DNA.
  - It involves cleavage of the parental strands during replication
