

the entire country. It was created behind closed doors and then signed by the authors. It can therefore be argued that the undemocratic way through which the document came to be nullifies the premise of democracy which it was meant to inspire. Other undemocratic elements of the United States constitution are: the tolerance of slavery, ~~salvage~~ limitation of Congressional power and judicial power which gives judges the ability to deem a law unconstitutional even after it has been approved by the legislature and then signed by the president.

Amar (2005) explains that since its inception, the U.S constitution has been democratized over the years. One way through which this has been done is by the bill of rights. Although the bill of rights was initially signed as a compromise, it came to give most rights needed in a democracy. These include freedom of speech and freedom of press. The constitution has given more control over the United States government and are in a position to demand more from the latter. Those over the age of 18 can now vote and get to elect the Senate directly. People have also realized that they have rights and that the government has responsibilities to them. There was once a time when some people were not allowed exercise legal rights. However, de jure rights to constitutional challenge are now universal. People are now more aware of their constitutional rights and claims. By giving people more access and control over the government and its institution, democratization of the United States, the promise of a country to the people has been realized. In this respect, it is clear that over the years, substantial changes have occurred vis-à-vis the constitution changing it from the original less democratic articles to a more fair and democratic constitution.

Federalism basically refers to a system of government where sovereign power is, as a function of the constitution, divided between constituent political units such as states and
