The purpose of the present research was to test the proposed model designed to increase reliability. First, questions of reliability, validity, generalizability, and the construct validity were tested. Then, to assess the fit of the proposed instrument, a confirmatory factor analysis was conducted. Finally, the construct validity of the instrument was tested by comparing the instrument with a construct validity instrument.

The average child has 4,000 missing teeth and with timely treatment and successful dental care, parents can ensure their children's permanent dentition is better served for a longer period by reducing contact with oral acids. The signs of baby's first eruption herald mother's plan to purchase fluoride-releasing dental products designed to help her baby's teeth stand strong and healthy.
