Paper 9691/02 Practical Programming Project

The number of good and very good projects increased this year. Many were more realistic in terms of the problem they were trying to solve. Many had clear indications of where the programming skills were to be found, how the programming style was developed, and with enough annotation within the coding to make it very clear just what the program was doing. More, also, were less than 30 pages long and not bound in hard covers, which are best kept for the return of the project.

The accuracy of the marking also improved, but there were some common concerns.

A common problem is where a Centre gives all the projects a high mark, but only one of the projects has any annotation. The differences are clear, and many of the marks for this project depend on the coding being well annotated.

Another concern is the Centres where Database Application Software, such as Access is used. The candidates use wizards and auto code to produce their files and screen layouts, but are credited with the design and programming marks as if they had done the work themselves. In this project we are interested in how well the candidate can design and test a program they have written, not how they can use Access.

There are also, sadly, Centres where the candidates enter work under the heading of Paper 2 when the contents all indicate that they are following the Paper 4 requirements. As there is so little programming in their work, it is not possible to do well on this paper when that sort of project is entered.

Overall, though, more Centres this time had their marks agreed by the Moderators, and more Centres gave us comments as to where the marks had been found. We thank all those teachers and hope that the quality will continue to rise.
