Discussion and Conclusion

It is evident that sieves can be used to separate both fine and coarse aggregates into different particle sizes. The number sieves describes what size aggregate fall through to the next. After the material has been sieved, we remove each tray, weigh each size, and record each weight to the nearest 0.1 g, and Ensure that all material entrapped within the openings of the sieve are cleaned out and included in the weight retained. After weighting of each sieve samples, we do some calculations to determine percentage (%) of retained aggregate, cumulative % agg retained and % agg passing of each sieve.

We conclude that sieve analysis is the simple and easy way to determine the particle size distribution of aggregate and this sieve analysis procedure can be used by people who are working in the laboratory like government laboratory and private independent laboratory.
