Abstract: This paper examines a novel approach to activated carbon (AC) production that uses pea waste (PW) and to what extent it is economically competitive with current production methods. Additionally, the outcome is to provide a detailed economic analysis to understand whether this process is viable. The focus of this production route and the economic analysis will be on a United Kingdom (UK) basis. The plant will be located within the north UK to minimise storage and transportation costs. It also has extensive links to other clusters of nearby industries that would produce from this process in air pollution control or wastewater treatments. The overall production process is detailed, and detailed equipment specifications, including the sizing of equipment and utility requirements, were also given. Material balance calculations are carried out to assess the performance and improve process designs. An economic analysis is performed to study the potential of biomass-to-AC conversion costs and commercialisation viability. The project's investment is about £100 million. The cost of the plant can be recovered from year 3 (mid) for the 20-year life of the plant. The Net Present Value (NPV) is based on cumulative cash flow. The NPV is calculated as GBP 4,476,137,297.79 for 2020, and the associated internal rate of return (IRR) and the return on investment (ROI) for the project are 55% and 52%, respectively.

1. Introduction

Converting waste into value-added compounds such as activated carbon (AC) is stemmed from the growing negative environmental impact and increasing limitations of fossil fuel resources. Research in this field has accelerated as energy consumption increases over time [1]. Utilising biomass provides a path to combat or mitigate the increasing worldwide demands for energy [2]. This international effort intends to utilise new and alternative technologies, which would lower the changes associated with environmental pollution and, in turn, global climate change through the development of industrial and agricultural technologies from renewable means such as biomass waste. The transition to cleaner energy or materials from renewable resources can be enhanced, allowing nations to have energy security and achieve sustainable development [3]. The significant challenges include integrating with the petrochemical industry, utilising robust technologies, and providing a surplus amount of biomass feedstock for valorisation. Determining a viable and sustainable process route can help increase stakeholder cooperation across value chains.

Applied Welfare Economics Chris Jones, 2005-05-05 Applied Welfare Economics uses important results in the welfare economics literature to extend a conventional Harberger cost benefit analysis After reviewing the properties of different welfare measures a conventional welfare equation is used to evaluate marginal policy changes in a general equilibrium economy with tax distortions The analysis is extended to accommodate trade and income taxes time internationally traded goods and non tax distortions including externalities non competitive behaviour public goods and price quantity controls The welfare analysis is developed in stages and where possible is explained using diagrams to make it more adaptable to the different institutional arrangements encountered in applied work With this in mind computable welfare expressions are solved using demand and supply elasticities for each good The lump sum transfers used in a conventional analysis to separate welfare effects are carefully examined to identify the role of the marginal social cost of public funds MCF in policy evaluation The main contribution in the book is to separate income effects for marginal policy changes in the shadow value of government revenue which converts efficiency effects into dollar changes in private surplus It is a scaling coefficient that makes income effects irrelevant in single aggregated consumer economies and conveniently isolates distributional effects in heterogeneous consumer economies The decomposition is used to test for Pareto improvements and to examine the separate but related roles of the shadow value of government revenue and the MCF in applied work
