

What are the main steps to remove a court judgement from my credit report?

Please note that these steps should be taken after you have rectified the previous negative court judgement against you. This means that you have paid off the necessary repayments ordered against you.

How do I write to the credit provider about my credit report?

One of the first steps to take when you are trying to remove a court judgement is to write to the credit provider. The credit provider is the first point of contact as they were the party who you owed the finances to and the party responsible for placing the court judgement against you. When you write to them, you should be asking them to confirm, in writing, that you have now paid them back. You should be obtaining this documentation as it shows that you have fully satisfied the court judgement debt placed on you and made positive steps to rectify your situation.

How do I write to the credit reporting body or bureau?

Once you have obtained the letter from the credit provider, you should provide this evidence to the credit reporting body to support a written request, by you, to remove the negative judgement from your record. If you are lucky, this step alone may be sufficient to remove the court judgement from your credit rating. However, large bodies like Equifax will not deem evidence of the repayment of your debt sufficient alone.

Unless the judgement on your report is incorrect, it can be challenging to remove a negative judgement before its automatic removal date which can range from two to seven years. This step will usually encourage the credit provider to add a notation to your judgement to say you have rectified the debt. That being said, you will still need to complete more steps to try and obtain credit in this two to seven year period.

How do I set aside the judgement with consent from a creditor?

Another way to remove a judgement from a credit report is through signed consent orders to set aside a previous judgement from the judgement creditor. If a judgement creditor files such orders, your credit reporting agency will receive an automatic notification to update and remove the judgement from your credit report.

However, be prepared for banks and other lenders to be reluctant to do this and it will be especially hard if you are yet to repay your debt. One of the common situations that can help is trying to set aside a partially paid judgement debt by entering a deed of settlement. This deed is basically a promise on how to settle the
