

4. What's the biggest difference -besides overall size and mass - between the Earth and Jupiter?
 - a. The Earth's solid surface has much more atmosphere on top of it than is the case for Jupiter.
 - b. Jupiter is composed mostly of liquid metallic hydrogen, while the Earth is mostly silicate rock, and iron.
 - c. Jupiter has much more of its surface area covered by oceans.
 - d. The Earth is mostly hydrogen and helium, while Jupiter is a good example of a 'Jovian' planet, made mostly of rock and metal.
5. Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn are sometimes referred to as the 'classical' planets. Why isn't Uranus in this list?
 - a. The cultures of the early, pre-telescopic observers all had room for only 5 planets in their religious and mythological interpretations of the sky.
 - b. The strange, highly tilted rotational axis of Uranus made it seem too strange to consider a planet like the others.
 - c. It's far enough from the Sun that, even though it's barely visible to the eye from time to time, it wasn't noticed by the pre-telescopic astronomers.
 - d. Uranus doesn't show any apparent 'retrograde motion' in the sky, so it wasn't considered a planet like the others.
6. In 1877, Mars was at opposition as seen from the Earth, and the Italian astronomer Schiaparelli described seeing 'canali' (singular: 'canale') on its surface. This wasn't translated into other languages (such as English) correctly. What was the result?
 - a. People thought he meant 'canals', which would imply that there are intelligent, canal-building Martians on the surface.
 - b. Astronomers reading translations of his report thought he meant that the surface of Mars is broken into large, channel-like valleys and ridges due to fracturing of its crust.
 - c. The study of Mars was set back for many years, because Schiaparelli hadn't seen evidence of active volcanic activity.
 - d. Other astronomers were highly impressed with the resolving power of his telescope, and basically left the study of Mars entirely up to him for decades.
