

Electric vehicles (EVs) are on the move, literally. There are more EV choices now than at any time in automotive history, and consumer sales of EVs have skyrocketed as EVs have achieved greater battery power, faster charging times, and lower fueling and maintenance costs. As EVs continue to become more affordable and economical, they will become even more commonplace.

Consumer Guide to Electric Vehicles

A Tale of Two EVs

EVs, by definition, include battery electric vehicles (BEVs), which are all-electric, and plug-in hybrid electric vehicles (PHEVs). EVs offer several benefits compared with vehicles with internal combustion engines (ICEs), including better fuel economy.

Perhaps the biggest difference between the two EVs is their driving range and operating efficiency. BEVs are limited in how far they can travel based on their battery charge. For example, in 2020 the average range of a light-duty BEV was 260 miles before needing to be recharged, with some models exceeding 400 miles on a full charge. Alternatively, PHEVs can travel much greater distances on a single battery charge because they also use an ICE to get power. But without charging the battery, PHEVs won't achieve maximum fuel economy or provide the full environmental and cost-saving benefits of EVs.

Both EV types help reduce greenhouse gases; BEVs virtually eliminate tailpipe emissions, whereas PHEVs produce no tailpipe emissions when in electric-only mode. For a comparison of vehicle emissions by state, see the Alternative Fuels Data Center's (AFDC) comparison tool at afdc.energy.gov/ev-emissions.html.

The Bottom Line: What an EV Means for You

A major consideration for EVs is the sizable improvement in fuel economy. EVs are more than three times more efficient than cars powered by today's conventional engines! This means the payback from fuel savings will offset the higher cost in less time. To find fuel economy ratings and fuel/vehicle cost comparisons among current models, visit fuelconomy.gov or, for a comparison of fuel prices over time, visit afdc.energy.gov/fuels/prices.html.

Nearly all major auto manufacturers have EV models available, and some automotive companies have committed to having electric-only models by 2030. For up-to-date information on available models, go to AFDC's "Vehicle Search" tool at afdc.energy.gov/tools or the "Find a Car" tool on fuelconomy.gov/FindACar.html.
