Stoop, 2015

The Consumer Protection Act introduced several concepts and principles which are new to South African law. One such concept is so called unsolicited goods and services and the prevention thereof as provided for in terms of section 21 of the CPA. Unsolicited goods and services can in laymen's language be described as unrequested or unwanted goods or services and in the narrow sense as goods or services that are delivered to a consumer without the consumer's knowledge or consent for which the consumer is expected to pay. A well known example of this is where a consumer receives books in the post without having ordered them together with an invoice in respect thereof indicating that the consumer will be automatically bound by a purchase agreement with the supplier if the books are not returned to the latter.
