

CMS 358: Communication and Personal Relationships
Exam #1 Study Guide

These are all the possible questions on the exam. The exam will include a subset of these questions (approximately 30%). The exam will be an open-note Quiz in Canvas. Some of the answers may not be explicit in the readings or in your notes but are conclusions or connections that you can make based on the material covered in the course. The points associated with each give an indication of how in-depth your responses should be (e.g., a 6-point question will require more description and depth than a 3-point question.) Students should come up with their own unique responses to non-definitional questions (e.g., creating a study).

1. What are the content and relational sides of communication? (2 points)
  - a. The content side of communication is the semantic meaning that is conveyed. It is usually a verbal message of what an individual is trying to communicate.
  - b. The relational side of communication has to do with how the message is communicated. Typically, nonverbal behaviors are what send this message, as they show how an individual feels about another person or relationship. Examples of nonverbal relational communication might be facial expression, body language, how close an individual chooses to stand to another individual. Other examples of relational communication might have to deal with the power status between two individuals and how that might affect their actions or behaviors.
  - c. When we communicate, both of these dimensions are almost always involved. Not only does someone send a verbal message, but there will also most likely be some sort of nonverbal behavior or action that conveys how someone feels about a relationship.
2. What are the 2 major outcomes researchers assess in personal relationships? How do you think each should be defined? How do you think each should be measured? (Give specific examples of how you would assess each.) Come up with your own conceptualization and measurement. (6 points)
  - a. Satisfaction and stability are the two major outcomes researchers assess in personal relationships. Satisfaction within a relationship can be defined as having one's relational needs met and being at or above one's expectations of what they think they should be getting out of the relationship. It might be measured based on how an individual's actual outcomes from a relationship compare to their perceived outcomes; if their actual outcomes are lower than their perceived, they are not satisfied, but if their actual outcomes are higher than their perceived, then they are more satisfied.
  - b. Stability within a relationship can be defined by both partners feeling equally secure and fulfilled within their relationship compared to how they would feel in other scenarios. It can be influenced by things such as trust, jealousy, commitment, or closeness. Stability might be measured by how a partner compares their relationship to other alternatives; if they feel like they are being equally treated and committed and getting a good relationship with their partner, the relationship would be stable. If they feel like there is not an equal balance and one partner's needs are not being fulfilled like the other partners are, or there is not an equal level of commitment, or if one partner feels like they can get a better relationship from someone else, the relationship is unstable. A stable relationship will exist when both individuals feel their relationship is their best-case scenario.
  - c. Both of these major outcomes define the status of personal relationships in terms of the perceptions and comparison, desires and fulfillment, and commitment associated within a specific relationship.
3. Describe the relationship-enhancing and distress maintaining cycles as covered in the text. (3 points)
