Required Knowledge Information Sheet

Common Modelling Assumptions

Particle - An object which is small in comparison with other sizes or lengths can be modelled as a particle. This means that the mass of the object can be considered to be concentrated at a single point (a particle is often referred to as a point-mass). The fact that a particle has no dimensions means that we can ignore the rotational effect of any forces that are acting on it as well as any effects due to air resistance.

Rod - An object with one dimension small in comparison with another (such as a metre ruler or beam) can be modelled as a rod. This means that the mass of the object can be considered to be distributed along a straight line. A rod has no thickness (it is one-dimensional) and is rigid (it does not bend or buckle).

Lamina - An object with one dimension (its thickness) very small in comparison with
