The Development of Communism

The path of communism in the Soviet Union might be related to two main aspects occurring at the beginning of the twentieth century. The first one is Lenin's role as a follower of Marxist teachings, where his writings on socialist society and the role of proletariat helped him seize the power right before the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917. The second aspect can be seen through the Bolshevik revolution itself, which combined with the conditions of the First World War and the revolt against the czar in 1905, helped setting the ground for the start of a communist government.

Seizing power after the revolution, Lenin during the period of his reign from 1917-1924, using force and terror against his opponents managed to take over the agriculture and the industries and restore the economy from its near collapse conditions by introducing the New Economic Policy (NEP) in 1921.

NEP was a policy that allowed the cooperation with social layers which were considered mostly as capitalists in post November revolution Russia allowing leasing and the use of their own productive assets. This period could be considered as prosperous in many ways as it can be considered as small-scale capitalism, and it can be argued that the development of the Soviet Union might have gone in different direction if NEP was established for a long-term period.

The Soviet Union was established in 1922, and after the death of Lenin in 1924, the one-party state took the shape of a dictatorship under the rule of Stalin.

Stalin "Socialism in One Country" emphasized heavy industrialization and collectivization in agriculture that brought about significant results in iron, steel, coal, and oil production, and the bringing of electricity to much of the country. The massive command economy created by Stalin was headed by Gosplan, the state planning commission that set quotas for all items produced by Soviet workers (Watson).

Small-scale capitalism was stopped with abolishing NEP during Stalin's rule, but nevertheless another form of capitalism could be witnessed, where state capitalism was established as the only class structure of industrial enterprises up until 1940 (Resnick and Wolff). It cannot be said the during Stalin's reign the state form was absolutely negative. It was during Stalin's years that the country was literally restored from ruins,
