Two low temperature laboratories have been operating in the Division of Building Research National Research Council of Canada since July 1954 The initial design of these cold rooms was first described by Gold 1 One cold room was used until 1970 by the Division s Building Services Section for experiments related to cold weather building research but is now being used by the Geotechnical Section for frozen ground studies Permafrost cold room The other cold room is used by the Geotechnical Section for ice research Ice cold room Construction and layout of the two rooms and a brief description of the associated refrigeration and control equipment are included in this paper In the 21 years since their construction these cold rooms have performed extremely well Some modifications and changes have recently been made however and new control systems were installed following which a performance study was made of the air temperatures maintained during steady state and transient conditions This study permitted fine adjustments to be made for optimum control of temperature stability and response The results of this study are also included in this paper This information is necessary to evaluate experiments performed in the cold rooms The temperature distribution and stability in the cold room affects the temperature history of samples of ice and frozen soil which are moved from zone to zone during storage machining and testing and also affect the time required for specimens to reach thermal equilibrium before testing
