

The Digestive System 3-D Model

When you swallow, the food enters the digestive system through a tube connecting the mouth to the stomach – the esophagus.

Food moves along the esophagus by contractions (peristalsis) that squeeze it down the tube.

In the stomach, food enters through a ring of muscle (cardiac sphincter). It is churned into chyme and mixed with acid to kill pathogens.

Next it enters the duodenum. This is the first part of the small intestine. Digestive enzymes from the pancreas are secreted to break down food. Bile from the gallbladder helps to digest fats.

The small intestine is where most of the digested food is absorbed. It has microscopic projections called microvilli to increase the surface area for absorption.

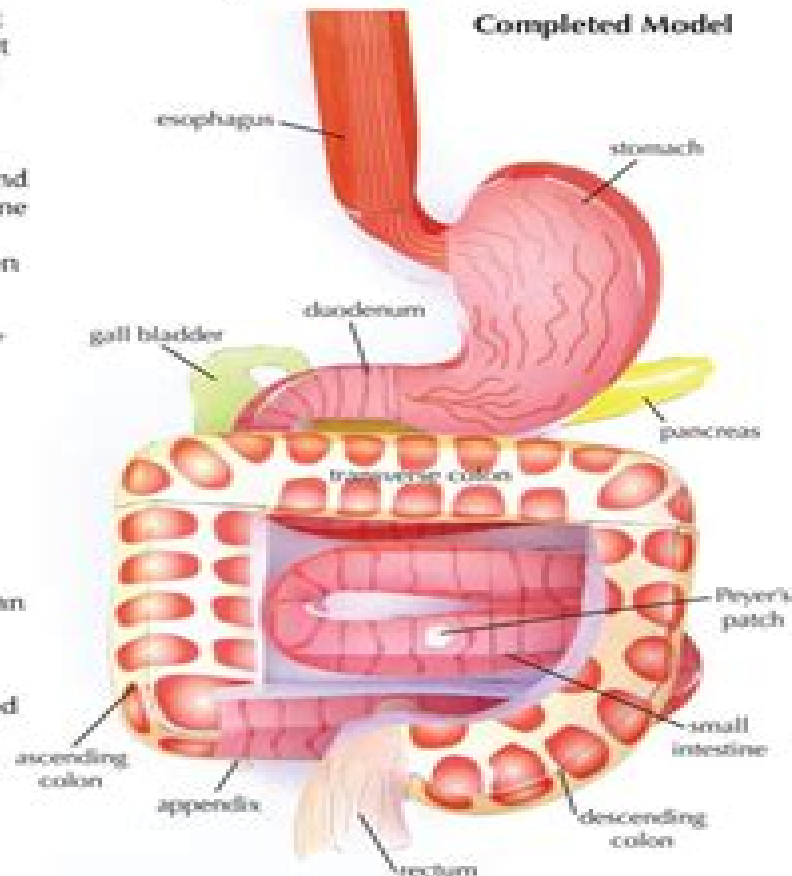

The enzymes from the pancreas and gallbladder enter the small intestine through the hepatopancreatic ampulla shown as a black circle on the duodenum.

White Peyer's patches have many immune cells to protect the small intestine from pathogens.

In the large intestine, water is absorbed. It contains bacteria that help break down any remaining food.

The appendix is located at the beginning of large intestine and can cause problems if infected.

Finally in the rectum undigested food and waste products are stored as feces before being expelled through the anus.
