This article uses South Africa as a case of study to reflect on socio-economic transformation challenges confronting the country within the context of democratic consolidation. It argues that although the 1994 democratic project has made considerable strides to enhance the well-being of the society, socio-economic challenges of unemployment, poverty, and inequalities still persists in the contemporary South Africa—hence South Africa's governing party mantra of radical socio-economic transformation. Citizens often demonstrate their discontent through acts of civil disobedience: protests. The last decade has increasingly pockmarked South Africa as a theater of social unrests. The article argues that this is the manifestation of democratic distemper rather than consolidation. In other words, democratic consolidation in South Africa should not, as many do, be understood merely as conceptual fiat but rather as a precondition towards alleviating the socio-economic challenges confronting the nation. If this does not happen, democratic distemper is spawned. The manifestation of this is civil unrest. A democratic project ought to be about, also more importantly, enhancing the economic opportunities of the citizens. This should result in creating jobs and reducing inequalities. For this to happen, socio-economic policies should be restructured in a way interrelated with the economic policy. This is important to advance the well-being of the society.

1 | INTRODUCTION

The end of colonialism and apartheid in various parts of the world has led scholars to direct their attention and energies to concepts such democratic transition and democratic consolidation. They have increasingly become more pronounced and prominent since the advent of democracy in most African states, including South Africa. As Przeworski (1991) explains, the nature of the transition determines the democratic success or failure of a nation. Munck and Leff (1997) make a very important point, related to this. They say that the degree and mode of transition from apartheid to democracy explains the type of a democratic society the country will inherit and its ability to consolidate such democracy. Wleczorek (2012) identifies factors such as poverty, inequality, and crime as indicators to determine whether the country's state of democracy, including the extent of its consolidation or distemper. In South Africa, the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa underscores the significance of healing the divisions of the past and establishing a society based on democratic values, social justice, and fundamental human rights. The Constitution lays a foundation for the establishment of the fundamental principles of democracy. However, the extent to which such principles are achieved remains a contested subject. The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa is one of the most celebrated in the world because it underscores the importance of democratic principles that protects among others, human rights, citizenship, and public participation (Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act 108 of 1996).

The notion "radical" socio-economic transformation owes its rise in the political and social landscape as a result of a rise in
