

DETACHED GARAGE SUPPLIED BY A THREE-WIRE BRANCH CIRCUIT

5. If a single circuit with a grounding conductor (either green or bare and attached to the grounding system in the house) is run from the house to the garage, no ground rod is required at the garage, see Detached Garage Supplied by a Three Wire Branch Circuit. For feeders from the house to the garage, an eight-foot ground rod must be driven at the garage. A grounding conductor is required with the branch circuit or feeder. When a feeder or more than one circuit is supplying the garage, a grounding electrode is required at the garage. If there is no existing grounding electrode, (metal underground water pipe) a ground rod is required and is connected to the equipment grounds in the garage, see Detached Garage Supplied by a Four Wire Feeder. This ground rod may be driven right outside the garage with a #6 copper ground wire attached to it. If the wire is subject to physical damage on the outside or inside of the garage, it must be protected by conduit. The easiest method of protection is typically 1/2-inch PVC. The #6 wire must be attached to the grounding system for the electrical in the garage.

6. The minimum wiring required in a detached garage that has electricity would include a means to disconnect the power to the garage, switches at the service door to control a light inside the structure, and a light outside the garage service door. Vehicular (overhead) doors of a garage are exempt from any lighting requirements. A minimum of one GFCI-protected readily-accessible receptacle somewhere inside the garage is also required.
