Chapter 1:

Optimal producer behaviour consists of three elements, namely calculation, negotiation, and expenditure.

Optimal consumer behaviour consists of three elements, namely calculation, negotiation, and expenditure.

In the market system, greater work skills and effort mean greater production and higher incomes.

Economic system: A particular set of institutional arrangements and a coordinating mechanism for solving the scarcity problem; a method of organizing an economy; of which the command system and the market system are the two general types.

Many economic models are very complex and give good predictions. Even very simple models give a framework from which more realistic models emerge.

The following are aspects of the concept of rational producer behaviour:

- The producer chooses the production technique and the productive inputs that will yield the highest possible profit in the end.
- The producer considers production factors- and the quantities thereof- used as inputs in the process.
- The producer thinks about the production process to reach the maximum output.

The following are aspects of the concept of rational consumer behaviour:

- Consumers know the wants (needs) that they seek to satisfy, then identify the matching products and decide on respective quantities that their budget constraints permit.
- The products and the quantities bought must provide the consumer with the highest possible total utility.
- Consumers think carefully before choosing the goods and services on which to spend their income.

A major argument for the market system, which does not necessarily have to do with economics, is the system's emphasis on personal freedom.
