

The Clinical Evaluation of Language Fundamentals, Fourth Edition (CELF-4)

A Review

Teresa Paslawski
University of Saskatchewan

The Clinical Evaluation of Language Fundamentals, fourth edition (CELF-4; Semel, Wiig, & Secord, 2003) by Eleanor Semel, Elisabeth H. Wiig, and Wayne A. Secord is the third revision of the CELF, originally published in 1980. The purpose of the CELF-4 is to screen for and diagnose language disorders in children and young adults. It can also be used for follow-up evaluation. It addresses the language concerns of students aged 5 to 21 years.

The CELF-4 was designed to reflect the clinical decision-making process beginning with making a diagnosis and determining the severity of a language disorder, identifying relative strengths and weaknesses, making recommendations regarding accommodations and intervention, and measuring the efficacy of intervention.

Administration

This is an individually administered assessment tool made up of 18 subtests organized into four levels of testing that address language content, structure, and use. Specific groups of subtests may be administered by the examiner to gain information about different aspects of a language disorder.

The first level of testing measures general language ability, determines the presence or absence of a language disorder, and assesses appropriateness of service by quantifying performance. The four subtests at this level make up the Core Language Score (CLS), the foundational score from which any or all of three pathways may be taken to provide more in-depth information. Subsequent levels of testing examine (a) the nature of the language disorder, (b) behaviors associated with the language disorder, and (c) the effect of the language disorder on classroom functioning. Each of these requires the administration of additional subtests.
