

The technique of classical conditioning is thus used in training behaviour where one can combine a natural stimulus linked to a response. Previous stimuli can also evoke fresh responses and other natural stimuli, thus the reference to conditioned stimulus or response.

Factors Affecting Classical Conditioning

Acquisition

Acquisition is a stage of learning that involves establishment and gradual strengthening of a response. The acquisition of a response lack gradual reinforcement that makes the behaviour to fade away systematically.

Timing

A conditioned response can easily decrease and eventually disappear especially when there are no other unconditioned stimuli for appropriate pairing of the conditioned response (Hock, 2002). Classical conditioning however lacks good definition of timing.

Well-known conditioned procedures have huge influences in determining the reliability of conditioned stimulus, which in turn generates the conditioned responses. The conditioning would however be more successful if there was good relative timing of conditioned stimulus as well as the unconditioned stimulus.

Measuring

Various effects on variation of conditional procedures can have an objective measure. The lack of an objective way of measuring strengths of classical conditioning makes the procedure inaccurate and less traditional. Painful stimulations cause instant reflexes of procedural behaviours.

The relationship between neutral conditional stimuli and the painful unconditional stimuli therefore requires a measure of a reduced behaviour, when conditional stimulus is present as opposed to when it is absent. A good example of the measure would be determining the reduction of a behaviour (suppression of a conditional reaction), when responding to a reduced conditional stimulus.

Predictability

The success and strength of classical conditioning depends on ability to determine the extent to which conditional stimulus predicts unconditional stimulus. Predictability requires that the correspondence between occurrences of the two stimuli vary, while
