

CHAPTER 4

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Accountants prepare financial reports on a periodic basis in order to furnish decision makers with timely information. Investors, creditors, management, and others cannot wait until the results of operations are known at the termination of business. They must have periodic and timely information, even if the information must be based on estimates and the results are somewhat tentative.
2. A 12-month accounting period is known as a company's fiscal year. Only when a company closes its books on December 31 is it said to be reporting on a calendar-year basis.
3. According to IAS18, for a sale of goods to be recognized as revenue, the amount of revenue and the costs incurred or to be incurred should be reliably measurable, and it is probable that the economic benefits (in most cases, cash) from the sale will flow to the seller. In addition, the seller should not continue managerial involvement in or maintain control over the goods. Finally, the rewards and significant risks associated with owning the goods should be transferred to the buyer.
4. The matching principle states that all costs and expenses incurred during a period to generate recognized revenues should be associated with those revenues in determining income (or loss) for the period.
5. Accrual-basis accounting recognizes revenues and expenses as they are earned and incurred, which is not necessarily in the same period as when cash is received or paid. For most businesses, this provides a more realistic measurement of income or loss. Accrual-basis accounting also provides a more correct financial picture of an entity's resources and obligations.
6. Accrual-based financial statements are considered somewhat tentative because the accounting measurements include amounts based on estimates and judgments. The exact results of business activity can be known only when activity has ceased and all resource flows can be accurately quantified.
7. Adjusting entries are needed for two reasons: (a) to recognize the proper amounts of revenues earned and expenses incurred during a period of time and (b) to report the appropriate balances in the asset, liability, and equity accounts at a particular date.
8. An accountant generally is not able to depend on source documents as the basis for adjusting entries. Instead, accountants must analyze the accounts at the end of the accounting period, prior to preparing the financial statements, to see which accounts need to be recorded (for unrecorded receivables and liabilities) and which accounts need to be adjusted and brought current (for prepaid expenses and unearned revenues). The amount of the adjusting entry depends on the original entry, if any, that has been made and what the updated balance in the account should be. The adjusting entries bring the accounts to their updated balances at the end of the period so proper results are reported in the financial statements.
9. The two basic steps involved in preparing adjusting entries are: (1) fix the balance sheet by making sure all assets, liability, and equity amounts are recorded correctly and (2) fix the statement of comprehensive income by making sure all revenues and expenses for the period are properly recorded.

Both steps are necessary for the correct amounts to be reported on the balance sheet (the financial position of the entity at the end of the period) and the statement of comprehensive income (the results of operations for the period).
10. The cash account is not increased or decreased as a result of adjusting entries because, as cash is received or paid, the original entries correctly reflect increases or decreases in that account. Cash is adjusted at the end of a period only when there has been an error in recording past cash transactions.

The primary purpose of adjusting entries, however, is not to correct errors. The main objective is to record previously unrecorded items and to adjust the balances in accounts,
