Characters such as Katcinsky and the Brunette French girl are described with "faces of the soil" and as having soft, brown skin. The opening scenes depict Paul and his comrades already behind the Front. The reader gets a more personal feel, as they are experiencing the war directly from Paul's thoughts.

Paul and the others have to teach the very young recruits how to survive the front.

The ending of the story is more depressing and disheartening, as Paul is listing all the ways his old friends died, before he himself dies.

Paul and all his comrades (besides Tjaden) are dead by the end of the story.

Kemmerich's boots are symbolic to the story and characters.

Overwhelming emotions, pain, and tragedies of war are shown and deeply expressed.

When on leave, Paul is terribly uncomfortable, and does not feel at home because of how ignorant his family and neighbors seem to be on war.

Paul and his comrades were brought to enlistment by their schoolteacher, only to see his preaching on war is not entirely how it truly is.

Characters such as Katcinsky and the brunette French girl are shown as caucasian.

The opening scenes show Paul and his classmates enlisting and training.

Paul's death is slightly more symbolic, with him reaching for a butterfly before he is shot.

Katcinsky is the one who teaches Paul and his classmates (the young recruits) how they are to survive the front.

There is a strong emphasis on the soldiers' boots after Mueller recieves Kemmerich's.
