

The transportation-land use connection influences both land use and transportation planning. While the most significant role that transportation plays in land development is in providing access, transportation facilities serve as a significant element of the built environment, creating both connections and barriers. For instance, a high-volume, four-lane highway may connect key areas of a community for vehicular travel, but safety concerns can deter pedestrians who need to cross the highway to get to resources on the other side. Traffic congestion on a thoroughfare can also be a barrier, causing motorists to seek alternative routes through residential areas. An understanding of these relationships is critical to solving and even preventing transportation-related problems, such as congestion, higher energy consumption, reduced air quality, threats to public health and safety, and decreased access to services and employment.

Debate on the relationship between transportation and land use typically hinges on whether the transportation network should be planned to accommodate anticipated land uses and growth, or the transportation network should evolve organically to accommodate traffic generated by the location of land uses and subsequent growth patterns. Ideally, transportation networks should be planned to anticipate and accommodate future needs. However, funding for costly transportation infrastructure is limited, particularly at the local level, with resources focused on alleviating immediate problems such as congestion, road maintenance, and safety issues caused by increased traffic volume.

As the dominant mode of travel in the United States since the Second World War, accommodation of the automobile has been a significant factor in land use development. Residential areas have evolved from walkable neighborhoods to subdivisions focused on optimum vehicular access. In recent years, public concerns about issues such as traffic congestion, energy conservation, and air quality have resulted in a broadening of transportation planning to focus on the full range of transportation options.

While roads comprise the majority of most transportation systems, they are not the only stable component. Effective transportation systems are built upon a broad, multimodal network of options that include rail, air, shipping, public transit, and pedestrian and bicycle systems. In general, a transportation system can be defined as any means used to move people and/or products. The Transportation Element provides an analysis of transportation systems serving Kershaw County including existing roads, planned or proposed major road improvements and new road construction, existing and proposed transit projects, and proposed and existing pedestrian and bicycle facilities and projects.

II. ROAD NETWORK

According to the 2017-2027 South Carolina Statewide Transportation Improvement Program (STIP), projected demand for travel in the State will continue to grow due to economic growth, as well as increases in the number of resident drivers and driving activity. While travel volume is generally greatest on the interstates, Federal and State highways and many local roads have
