Outdoor Recreation Potential in East Texas Ivan W. Schmedemann, Alvin B. Wooten, W. D. Franklin, Texas Agricultural Experiment Station, 1964 Outdoor recreation is big business in Texas and there are strong indications that it will become much larger in the future as recreational resources are developed incomes rise and population continues to increase The 12 county study area designated East Texas Area XIII is strategically located for recreational use It is within a 200 mile radius of nine Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas in the State which account for more than 40 percent of the population of Texas and is less than 100 miles from the 15 million people living in nearby metropolitan areas There should be sufficient population in nearby areas to support intensive development of outdoor recreation facilities in Economic Area XIII Several factors should be considered by potential producers of outdoor recreation Some of the more important considerations are the human factors involving management and enterprise selection farm resources liability risks capital restrictions location demand and personal and community attitudes toward recreation Multiple activity recreational enterprises should be especially well suited for this area of East Texas This area should become a major supplier of outdoor recreation in Texas
