China and Southeast Asia's Ethnic Chinese Paul J. Bolt, 2000-09-30 Bolt uses the relationship between China and Southeast Asia's ethnic Chinese as a case study and he focuses on the potential role of a diaspora in the economic and political development of its homeland as well as the role of the state in dealing with transnational economic actors He examines China's post 1978 policy of attracting ethnic Chinese investment in light of historical relations between China and its diaspora community demonstrating that China has through various measures consistently aimed at tapping the resources of Asia's ethnic Chinese He then analyzes the contributions that ethnic Chinese have made to China's development showing that such contributions have been tremendously important both in terms of the accumulation of capital and the transfer of business skills Bolt probes how ethnic Chinese intervention in China's economy has affected the politics of the Chinese state He concludes by looking at the international implications of Chinese development being spurred largely by a Chinese diaspora community and he demonstrates how China's efforts to attract ethnic Chinese investments have complicated China's relations with Southeast Asia and led to discussions of a Greater China An important analysis for scholars researchers and policy makers involved with contemporary Southeast Asian and Chinese political military and economic issues

The Nation and Economic Growth Kunio Yoshihara, 1994 This book a comparative study of the Philippines and Thailand breaks new ground by highlighting the impact of non economic institutions and cultural kinship and political values on economic performance The Philippines and Thailand two developing South East Asian countries which faced similar situations and problems after the Pacific War pursued divergent paths in shaping their destiny The results have been dramatic especially when we consider that postwar the Philippines per capita GNP was twice that of Thailand's but by the end of the period under study the position had reversed In examining the factors that influenced this transformation the author elucidates the response of both countries to the economic dominance of the Chinese minority and their attitude towards foreign investment He analyses their government's intervention in the market economy including a discussion of the traditions of their central banks and the role played by their military establishments He also focuses on their handling of peace and order issues include the Communist insurgency Muslim separatism military coups and serious crime culminating in a discourse on traditional values
