

Documentation for data centre migrations

Data centre migrations are part of the normal life cycle of a typical enterprise. As organisations expand, many reach a point where maintaining multiple, distributed data centres becomes increasingly complex and expensive to support. Integration of systems, applications and infrastructure, together with consolidation of staff and support services becomes a key driver for improving efficiency, and reducing complexity and costs.

The chances are that you will encounter an enterprise undergoing this process at some stage in your career as a technical communicator. I was recently involved in a complex migration project that involved consolidating 18 data centres, located throughout Europe, into a single, centralised data centre. This article describes some of the strategies and methods we used for collecting and managing the information required for the data centre migration.

Migrations are highly complex and what is described in this article is only intended to provide an introduction to this topic.

Adopting a structured approach to data collection

Reliable information about the current data centre infrastructure is key to facilitating a smooth migration and avoiding downtime to critical business systems. It is often the role of technical communicators to collect this information, which is then used by technical architects and project managers to plan the migration and set up new infrastructure.

For the technical communicators involved, knowing where to start and how to manage the information gathering can be a challenge. A structured approach to your project can help ensure its success. The steps described in this article provide a methodological approach to this task.

Step 1. Set clear project expectations

Set clear expectations about your role at the start of the project. (This is essential, as you may be working with colleagues who have overlapping responsibilities.) One way to do this is by producing a project brief, which is a short document that outlines your role, the scope of the deliverables, and time scales for completion. Have this approved before commencing any work.

Once you have a high-level agreement outlining your role on the project, you can start working towards a detailed project plan, which outlines:

- What data you will be collecting
- How you will collect the data
- When you will need to do this by

There may be dependencies, for example, the availability of subject matter experts who can provide you with the information you need, or work that needs to be done by third parties before you can commence. Your project plan should make provision for any foreseeable dependencies.
