Abstract: Background: Longitudinal studies suggest that low maternal education is related to poor child health outcomes. Methods: We used data from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health (Add Health) to examine the association between maternal education and child health outcomes. Results: Children of mothers with less than a high school education were more likely to be overweight, have asthma, and have behavioral problems than children of mothers with a high school education or more. Conclusions: These findings suggest that maternal education is an important determinant of child health outcomes.

So, while we're at it, a related question: how often do you find yourself wanting to read the authors of the books you're reading? I know, I know. The answer is "not very often." But I do find myself wanting to read the authors.

The researchers' results are relevant primarily to early adolescence, a study of Israeli youth. Israeli youth are somewhat different from the American and European youth groups included in the review, so the review is not directly applicable.
