PSY 111 INTRODUCTION TO PSYCHOLOGY

Nature and Definition of Modern Psychology

Psychology is a relatively young science. Nevertheless, it was Rudolf Goeckle (1590) who used the word psychology for the first time. However, it was Wilhelm Wundt (1879) who established the first ever psychology laboratory in Leipzig, Germany that led to the separation of psychology from philosophy (see school of structuralism in the next block)

The word psychology is derived from a combination of two Greek words "Psyche" and "logos". Pysche means "soul" and logos means "knowledge". Thus psychology literally came to be known as "the study of the soul". The early thinkers (philosophers) ascribed the mental activities of human being to a power that was not tangible and which was hidden from the outer senses. They called this intangible power the soul. The soul was the main concern of both philosophy and religion.

The definition above was found to be inadequate for several reasons. First, it was rejected because Aristotle and his associates could not satisfactorily explain the relation of soul and to the body. Secondly, it "was rejected to dualism nature that involves the study of physical and spiritual matters. Later on the word soul was replaced by the term mind. So psychology came to be known as "the study of science of the mind". Early Greek philosophers who were opposed to the earlier definition of psychology held this definition. However, this definition did not last because by calling itself a science, it was not automatic whether psychology was a positive or normative science. Finally, the thinkers who used the term mind did not agree on its nature.

Psychology was later defined as "the science of consciousness". In the view of James Sully, psychology has to do with the inner world and has to employ introspection as its method. Wilhelm Wundt (1879) was of the opinion that psychology being the study of consciousness deals with internal experience which
