There is a trend in science, particularly in politically correct science, promoting the notion that some scientific-based ideas should not be questioned. Ideas such as global warming and macroevolution are two of the most prominent examples — but there are many others.

This finding suggested that other organisms might also alter behavior or even be responsible for psychiatric disorders such as depression, anxiety, and schizophrenia,³⁻⁵ as well as altering a person's response to stress and affecting memory and thinking.⁶

Further powerful evidence came from studies using animals raised with no microorganisms in their intestines. (Germ-free animals can be made by giving the animals antibiotics.) Researchers found that by transferring bacteria from the colon of other normal animals to the germ-free animals,
