26 Fiscal policy

- 1 Correct answer: B direct tax

Direct taxes are imposed on earnings, such as income and profits. Corporate tax (Option A) and income tax (Option C) are examples of direct tax.

- 2 Correct answer: C reducing taxes and raising government expenditure

To expand (boost) the economy, fiscal policy can be used by reducing taxes (to encourage consumption expenditure) and raising government spending (which fuels economic activity).

- 3 Correct answer: D reduce taxes and reduce interest rates

By reducing taxes, consumer demand should be encouraged as households have more disposable income. Cutting interest rates also enables households and firms with existing loans to spend more money and encourages new borrowing which also boosts national output and employment. Option A is a supply-side policy.

- 4 Correct answer: D Lower interest rates increase the spending ability of households and encourage firms to invest more.

Reducing interest rates can indeed create more spending power (as households with existing loans and mortgages have more disposable income), but this is monetary policy. Fiscal policy involves changes to taxes and government expenditure.

- 5 Correct answer: C when government revenues exceed public expenditure

The government will have a budget surplus if it spends less than the sum of its sources of revenue. Options A and B refer to the balance of payments, not the budget itself.

- 6 Explanations might include:

- To redistribute income and wealth (1) so that the less privileged have access to basic needs and wants (1), thus raising living standards in the economy (1).
- To reduce or alleviate poverty (1) by spending on welfare benefits for the poor (1) or providing them with basic housing and shelter (1).
- To provide public goods and services (1), such as street lighting, public libraries, schools, hospitals, national parks and affordable housing (1).
- To steer the economy out of recession (1) by increasing government spending in the domestic economy (1).

- 7 Explanations might include:

- To boost investment expenditure in the economy (1) as firms have more retained profit due to the zero-rate tax (1).
- To encourage multinational companies (1) to set up in these countries due to the absence of taxes on company profits (1).
- To increase incentives to work (1) as firms are able to hire more workers and/or pay existing workers more (1).
- To encourage risk taking and entrepreneurship (1), thereby improving the productive capacity of the economy (1) and enhancing the country's international competitiveness (1).
