Coursera Strategy & Sustainability Syllabus

1. Introduction

Business as a general rule has a hard time with the concept of environmental sustainability. Business is about making money. Sustainability is about protecting the planet and the creatures (including humans) on it. The time scale for business is measured in quarters, annual results, three to five year plans, etc. Climate change, deforestation, reduction in biodiversity, etc. occur over decades or even centuries. It's difficult to bridge the gap.

Sustainability, or to be more precise, the men and women who are deeply concerned about it, often have a difficult time with business. For many activist and government administrators, the fundamental motives of business are opaque and even suspect. Even entrepreneurs involved in developing new environmentally friendly technologies often fall short when thinking through how to fund their development and actually make a return on any potential investor's money.

One constituency that has the potential to connect these two worlds are consumers. The problem is that even in the relatively rich, so called developed world, it is difficult to get people to pay more for goods and services that are supposedly more sustainable. Though some such claims are tenuous at best, there does appear to be firm evidence of a growing segment of consumers who will, all things being equal, make purchasing decisions that they perceive to be more eco-friendly. For now, however, most of these eco-minded consumers focus exclusively on the food category; even they appear reluctant to pay extra for this benefit when it comes to other types of purchases.

Another place one might look for balance is academia. Yet even here we find a deeply polarized situation. Most academic papers dealing with these issues are written by researchers and professors who care deeply about the environment and their personal bias shines through their research. On the other side, researchers are so highly skeptical, their work is not even taken into consideration by the first group. To make this all more complicated, the mathematical models that determine the new impact of virtually any technology or practice are very complex. This complex nature leaves plenty of room for bias: previously held assumptions creep in to make such calculations possible.

The purpose of this course is to attempt to bring the worlds of business and sustainability a little bit closer together. Its approach is not to provide a passionate argument based on hopeful assumptions, but to seek out common understanding in two directions.

In the first place, the course provides a framework for managers, CEOs and members of boards of directors to think about sustainability in their own language. That means discussing the issues in terms that recognize their fiduciary responsibility to their partners, customers, employees and shareholders.

At the same time, the course provides insight on how firms operate to people passionate about sustainability. It is my hope that with this new perspective, they will be able to engage with business in a positive and pro-active way and in so doing, have a positive impact on the environment while influencing
