

Work, energy, and power

→ Energy conservation

- The concept of work (done)

- In Physics, work is done when an object is moved over a distance by an external force applied in the direction of its displacement
- Simply, it's the force x displacement moved in the direction of the force

$$W = F \cdot d$$

Diagram illustrating the formula $W = F \cdot d$ with labels:

- W : WORK DONE (J)
- F : FORCE (N) APPLIED IN DIRECTION OF DISPLACEMENT
- d : DISPLACEMENT (m)

- In the diagram below, the man's pushing force on the block is doing work as it is transferring energy to the block (increasing its kinetic energy)

Work is done when a force is used to move an object over a distance

- When work is done, energy is transferred from one object to another
- Work done can be thought of as the amount of energy transferred, hence its units are in Joules (J)
- Usually, if a force acts in the direction that an object is moving then the object will gain energy
- If the force acts in the opposite direction to the movement then the object will lose energy
