- A simplified anatomical diagram of the human digestive system. It shows the mouth at the top, leading to the esophagus, then the stomach. The small intestine is depicted as a long, coiled tube. The large intestine is shown as a wider, more structured tube that loops around the small intestine. The rectum is at the bottom, leading to the anus. The diagram is color-coded: the mouth and esophagus are red, the stomach is orange, the small intestine is yellow, the large intestine is green, and the rectum is red.

The diagram is a whimsical, mechanical representation of the human digestive system. At the top, a person's head is shown with food entering the mouth. The food travels down a tube (esophagus) into a large, rounded stomach. The stomach is connected to a series of smaller tubes and containers (small intestine) where various enzymes and secretions (from the liver and gallbladder) are added. The food then moves into a long, horizontal tube (large intestine) where water and vitamins are absorbed. The remaining material is then moved into a vertical tube (rectum) and finally expelled through the anus into a toilet. The diagram also shows a circulatory system (heart and blood vessels) and an excretory system (nephrons and kidneys) connected to the digestive system.
