

Compass Reading

A compass is used to find the location of Magnetic North. Knowing where the magnetic north is, a person can easily identify the direction he/she is headed by using a map.

Aside from north, there are 31 other points found on a compass. These points are divided into principal and non-principal points. Principal points are further sub-divided into three: cardinal, inter-cardinal, and non-cardinal.

The term box the compass means to identify all the points of the compass starting from north going clockwise.

An Orienteering Compass

The picture on the left is a picture of an orienteering compass. The rectangular base with all the measurements is the compass base plate. On the base plate there is an arrow, that arrow is called the direction of travel arrow. The painted arrow within the compass housing that houses the magnetic needle is called the orienteering arrow and the magnetic needle is called the magnetic north arrow or the dig. The compass housing is sometimes called as the degreecase.

The term place the dig in the dig house or orient the compass simply means to point the orienteering arrow towards the direction of magnetic north.

Degree Notations

Most often, compass bearings aren't given to you in words (e.g., North, South), it is usually given in degrees. The compass rose is divided into  $360^\circ$  from 0 to 359. To be more accurate, surveyors and foresters use fraction of a degree. A degree is divided into 60 minutes ( $60'$ ) and a minute is divided into 60 seconds ( $60''$ ).

There are also times when bearings are given in notations such as  $28^\circ$  North of East. Meaning from facing east, turn  $28^\circ$  towards the north.
