Chapter Summary

I. There is no clear consensus on what the term "persuasion" means.

A. Different definitions emphasize different aspects of persuasion.

B. Some definitions emphasize "pure" cases of persuasion, while others include "borderline" cases of persuasion as well. Consider the hypothetical situations in Box 2.1.

II. Various definitions of persuasion may be categorized according to five limiting criteria.

A. Source-oriented definitions emphasize intentionality as a defining characteristic of persuasion.

B. Some authors distinguish between persuasion and social influence, based on an intent criterion; e.g., persuasion is intentional, social influence is not.

C. Problems with relying on an intent criterion include:

1) Influence may be accidental or unconscious, or may operate at a very low level of awareness.

2) Persuaders aren't always aware of their intentions.

3) Unintended receivers may be influenced by persuasive messages.

4) There are difficulties involved in determining a persuader's intent.

5) There may be intra-audience effects, e.g., receivers persuade one another.

6) An intent requirement emphasizes a linear view of persuasion.

D. Receiver-oriented definitions emphasize effects as the defining characteristic of persuasion.

E. Problems with relying on an effects criterion include:

1) An effects criterion emphasizes persuasion as a product, or outcome, rather than a process.

2) An effects criterion entails a linear view of the persuasion process, from the source to the receiver. In reality, influence attempts are often mutual or reciprocal.

3) There are inherent difficulties in measuring or assessing persuasive effects.
