

A Family Caregiver Guide to Selecting Rehabilitation Programs for Persons With Disorders of Consciousness (DoC)

January 2023

<https://msktc.org/tbi/factsheets>

TBI Factsheet

This factsheet explains the medical and rehabilitation care needs of persons with disorders of consciousness (DoC). It discusses the questions to ask when searching for the right program for your loved one with a DoC.

Background and Overview

This factsheet is intended for use by family caregivers of persons with DoC. This may include family members, partners, friends, or other caregivers. A person with DoC is not aware of their own self or surroundings. They can't stay awake or interact with others. DoCs include coma, unresponsive wakefulness syndrome (also called the vegetative state), and the minimally conscious state. A detailed description of these conditions and the recovery that follows can be found at <https://msktc.org/tbi/factsheets/facts-about-vegetative-and-minimally-conscious-states-after-severe-brain-injury>.

After a severe traumatic brain injury (TBI), a person may have a DoC that lasts a long time. If your loved one has a DoC but is ready to leave the hospital or acute care unit, they will still need close monitoring and expert care. As a family caregiver, you are an important part of the care team. Family caregivers should be involved in all phases of care and discharge planning.

Persons with DoC may benefit from rehabilitation, also sometimes called rehab. But, not all rehab programs are a good fit for persons with DoC. Some programs don't have the skilled staff, knowledge, or services needed to provide quality care to your loved one. A lack of expertise may lead to inappropriate care decisions and poor outcomes.
