Do the FMVRS 100 Standards Apply to Replacement Brake Part Performance?

Yes, The Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard 100 applies to new vehicles. Replacement parts used during a brake repair or replacement may or may not pass the criteria to achieve the same dependability when new.

To help ensure the new braking performance, the service technician should always use quality brake parts from a known manufacturer.

2) Hydraulic-Circuit Failure. This test is performed to ensure that the circuit will be started by the basic warning system, whether or not a failure has occurred, and that the circuit can still be stopped in an emergency situation.

Although these tests may seem simple, these tests are only a minimum standard of performance. Any home system with enough power to pass the tests is more capable of meeting NABCC's goals.

BLAKE REPAIR AND TUNE UP

Regardless of whether there are specific test questions/needs, a testmaker is always faced with the challenge of finding ways to best require performance in an experimental or assessment-like manner. Considering the time and property that should be given to each testee, there is only one acceptable goal when making tests: to test capacity by means of the system and its component parts so they perform to original specifications; in other words, the purpose of a test is to measure the true performance.
