Not surprisingly, the entrepreneurs sought to give their third-generation institutions better value for their money in addition to what they had previously received by giving them an equity share in the companies. They also hoped to ensure that the third-generation institutions would continue to operate the business and assets that they had built.

This would produce a low degree of correlation between rising growth rates and growth of the world as a whole. This would generally diminish the dependency relationship between East and West, rising growth rates would tend to be the result of low savings and hence would not be enjoyed just as the developing world's economy would become isolated from the rest of the world as a whole.
