Measurements in buildings have not received the same degree of attention and at the time of writing of this document there are no nationally or internationally recognised standards or guidelines on this subject in general use in the UK. In many cases this does not present a problem but in a minority of building projects disputes can arise due to the lack of a comprehensive specification as to how noise levels should be measured. In such cases different choices of measurement conditions, parameters and positions can give rise to different conclusions and competent independent consultants can reach opposite conclusions as to whether an installation complies with a specification.
