

General Functioning

Colt's No. M2 is an air-cooled gas magazine-fed automatic weapon. It is necessary to "cock" it manually to fire the first round a minute.

When the burning powder violently generates gas which expands the gas case and barrel starts a tremendous pressure. This pressure at the moment is still within the cartridge case and which has a thrusting force of five tons pushes the bullet out of the barrel. This thrusting force of five tons pushes the chamber toward the rear. Such thrusting the bolt positively locked against the rear of the cartridge at the

General Functioning

When the cartridge is fired the force of recoil causes the barrel, barrel extension, and magazine to the remaining portion backward a short distance. See Figure 10A. This distance allows the bolt from the barrel and barrel extension, and the bolt carrier back forward toward the rear against a spring. This spring serves to drive the bolt forward again. The empty case is withdrawn by the bolt from the barrel chamber and the next cartridge is extracted from the magazine.

The long rearward motion of the bolt is checked and as it stops forward the empty case is ejected and the next cartridge is moved into the barrel chamber. See Figure 10B. The bolt having checked the short rearward motion of the barrel and extension, the arrangement preventing the case from being driven toward the rear. The bolt forward motion of the barrel and barrel extension causes the heavy pin to strike the cartridge, providing a means of ramspring the next cartridge. This cycle continues as long as trigger action is maintained and as long as ammunition is supplied.
