Expansionary Demand Side Policies:

Expansionary Fiscal Policy:

Intro: Fiscal policy is the manipulation of government spending, borrowing and taxation which aims to influence aggregate demand to stimulate growth and boost the economy.

P1 : Government spending:

- Point:
- The UK government attempted to boost the economy through large amounts of government spending and borrowing in order to achieve economic growth.
- After the recession the UK increased their government spending by investing £3 Billion into capital.
- Cause:
- Capital Spending is where the government spend money on public goods that don't need renewing in the short term (shifting LRAS curve rightwards).
- This was very important as unemployment sky rocketed after 2008 from 5% to 8% in early 2009.
- This investment into infrastructure projects meant that in the short term, AD shifts to the right and hence output and so employment increased, as more workers are needed to provide goods and services at this higher output, easing the issue of a rise in unemployment.
- Consequence:
- Furthermore, due to this rise in employment, more people would have disposable incomes from being employed and so consumption in the economy would increase, which is an effect of the multiplier of an injection of government spending into the circular flow of income.
- In the long run it would also mean that the productive capacity of the economy increased due to better transport and capital, perhaps meaning that further expansionary fiscal policy could occur without inflationary pressure.

Evaluation:

- However, this government spending was financed through government borrowing, and this could lead to crowding out of the private sector.
- This is where the government borrows excessively to finance its investment projects, and so the supply of loanable funds decreases and their demand increases.
- This leads to higher interest rates on the loans and investment from private firms may be reduced due to this, hence employment may not actually increase as much as predicted, meaning the unemployment issue could be still an issue.
- Furthermore, there is no guarantee that capital spending will work, and it may be assumed a short term policy, yet there is a significant time lag associated with capital spending. This takes time and effort as capital tends to be rather inflexible and
